She previously served as Supervisor of the Communication Department. She earned her PhD from Dublin City University, Ireland, in 2023, with a doctoral thesis entitled The impact of watching Turkish drama on Saudi women's attitudes and perception patterns: An audience study. She also holds a master's degree in Communication and a bachelor's degree in Food and Nutrition from King Abdulaziz University. Her scholarly work examines the content and complexities of foreign drama through critical analysis and a range of research methodologies, including opinion analysis and mixed-methods content analysis. Through this work, she seeks to explore the cultural and social contexts of dramatic works and understand their influence on audiences. She also contributes to scholarly research by serving as a peer reviewer for several academic journals in drama and film studies, including journals indexed in the Web of Science and Scopus databases.

Alongside her research, Dr. Alardawi conducts specialised workshops in screenwriting, film criticism, and podcast production. She also teaches courses on television drama series and films from a critical perspective, helping students deepen their understanding of the aesthetics, techniques, and cultural significance of visual storytelling while developing their creative skills in filmmaking and screenwriting. She initiated the student film festival at King Abdulaziz University, which aims to foster a vibrant community of filmmakers and storytellers and encourage applied artistic production in media studies. Her academic interests also encompass adaptation and hybridity in dramatic and cinematic writing, particularly their relationship to the representation of women in television series and films. Her career reflects a commitment to bridging academic research and practical application, advancing film and media studies, and supporting a new generation of filmmakers and creative media professionals.
